The White House statement was made after a series of developments of obvious significance, beginning with the official admission that Ambassador Harvey had called from London for consulta-here. This was followed by a conference of considerable length between Dr. Otto Wiedfeldt, the German amdor, and Secretary Hughes, at which, it became known, the economic plight of Germany, already described in American official advices as on the verge of collapse, was discussed with its ap-alication to the reparations tangle. Later Dr. Wiedfeldt left for New York elthout announcing the object of his journey. In diplomatic and other circles, however, it was recalled that J. P. Mor-gan, New York financier, had conferred recently with Mr. Hughes, and was an inclination to associate two conferences and to link them with the project for a loan to Germany by American bankers, When it became known still later that question had been among discussed in a two hour sessint of the cabinet, added significance was attached to this phase of events.
